KN.COM - NEWS

Justin O'Shea, Brioni's creative director, has a perfect look for a storied Italian fashion house known for made-to-measure suits. O'Shea, a heavily tattooed, buff man (he boxes almost every day) with a shaved head and full beard, could have been recruited from the pool of Fight Club. However, O'Shea's swagger is the reason Brioni brought him on board in early 2016: pressed on how his edgy aesthetic would transcend the typical Brioni customer, O'Shea says, "I want suits and shirts that can be worn by a dude on Wall Street or a fucking gangster appearing in Scorsese's The Wolf of Wall Street. For Fall, O'Shea recruited heavy metal band Metallica to appear in Brioni's campaign and switched the logo to one more evocative of Oktoberfest than Milan. Inspiration for the collection, O'Shea notes, "came from the '70s, which is why, for example, there are shirts in the show as well as the new Continental with a broader, slightly padded shoulder that is a very much in at the waist." When asked, "Why the disco, why now?" O'Shea responds, "It was a time when fashion was greatly appreciated by others, when it could be both ultra-masculine and at the same time open about fashion." Speaking on his use of sex and leather, such as crocodile and chinchilla, O'Shea adds, "For me it's seeing people go, 'Oh my god, a pimp,' and it's the ultimate luxury."

But while O'Shea acknowledges his design is rooted in the past, he also has his eyes firmly set on the future: menswear and hopes that his dressed-up, but devil-may-care attitude mixes things up. "It's like messing with something that's so formal and giving your own spin on it, like there is no right or wrong he says. On his own style, O'Shea is uncharacteristically low-key given the larger-than-life image he has created for himself. "I'm pretty much a guy's guy," he does wear suits all the time. That's why I took the job—quite literally, the perfect fit." —JA
