Just Don't Call Me a Model

is an era of glass ceilings yet to be broken, one of the few professions in which women are naturally guaranteed to receive better compensation and more accolades than their male counterparts is modeling. There is no Tyra Banks, or even likeable Naomi Campbell, Christy Turlington, or Linda Evangelista, and you would be hard-pressed to find a male equivalent to Kendall Jenner or Gigi Hadid. (With more than 2 million Instagram followers, Lucky Blue Smith has about 10 percent the reach of Hadid.)

Still, an intrapod group of guys is getting noticed. Some have fashion on their blood: Chase Hill, 17, followed in the footsteps of his model sisters Mackinley and Taylor. Others, like Cody Lohan, 20, who got an agent thanks to an Instagram post from sister Lindsay, boast recognizable surnames. The 23-year-old photographer Roberto Rossellini, who was scouted on the streets of New York, sought the counsel of his mother, Isabella, before moving to the other side of the camera.

For most of them, modeling is a way to draw attention to other projects. Thirty-year-old Will Peltz, brother of actress Nicola, squeezes in shoots with Calvin Klein between films. Nyima Ward, 20, the son of the 1990s supermodel Trish Goff and a new favorite of the photographer Steven Meisel, considers himself "more a woodworker, honestly, than a model." Luka Sabbat, 18, a self-described "artist-entrepreneur-champion and model at request," was discovered at 16, but was initially wary of the industry. "I didn't back with it—it took work," he recalls. He's since come around (with a gentle nudge from his father), walking for Yeezy and stepping up as a Tommy Hilf model. He's also a Tommy Lee look-alike. Thomas Lee, 20, the son of Pamela Anderson and Tommy Lee, and a star of Dolce & Gabbana's spring campaign, didn't need any convincing. "It's great to have your face plastered on stuff so everyone can get to know you," he says. "People would say, 'Okay, for the last year, you've done more modeling work than acting.' But I like to classify myself as just an actor. What I do to achieve that can go a thousand different ways." VANESSA LAWRENCE

With their good looks—and even better genes—these guys are definitely not pose
